We have examined the cytokine production of natural killer (NK) cells in multiple sclerosis (MS) patients and have evaluated their capacity to influence the proliferation of T cells. Cytokine production by unstimulated NK cells and the effects of NK cell-conditioned supernatants on proliferation of blood lymphocytes were studied in patients with MS (n = 32) and in normal controls (n = 25). In addition, production of both Th1 and Th2 cytokines was evaluated in NK cells from patients with MS (n = 15). Mononuclear cells from patients with MS were activated with PHA or with PMA and ionomycin, and NK cells were separated from PBL by counterflow centrifugal elutriation. Interleukin-2 (IL-2), IL-4, and interferon (IFN)-gamma were measured in the supernatants of whole cultures and in supernatants of NK cells after stimulation. By whole cultures, NK cells from MS patients produced less IL-10 (p < 0.01) and TGF
