Immunoglobulin G cryoglobulins in dilute serum: diagnostic implications. The detection and quantitation of immunoglobulin G cryoglobulins by a latex test is simple, inexpensive, and well tolerated. As the diagnostic value of the test remains to be defined, identification of the cryoprecipitate fraction is important. For dilute serum samples it is necessary to determine the incidence of cryoglobulin-positive cryocrits obtained by microcentrifugation of fresh specimens. We obtained blood specimens from 119 patients with recent onset illness, including 44 who had no clinical or laboratory evidence of infectious or inflammatory disease. Blood was collected in acid-citrate-dextrose or heparin. Of the 119 patients, 31 of 56 (55%) with recent onset disease and one of 63 (2%) who were healthy had cryoglobulin-positive cryocrits. The cryoprecipitate fraction accounted for one of three to six cryocrits that were cryoglobulin positive by the latex test. The cryoglobulin-positive cryocrit fraction (4.6%) was threefold greater in patients with recent onset disease compared with healthy subjects (1.5%). The relative incidence of cryoglobulin-positive cryocrits varied widely between patients with infectious or inflammatory disease, but
